Saving Stream Fish

BY PATRICIA EDMONDS

Since the early 1980s ichthyologists J. R. Shute and Pat Rakes have splashed throug southeastern U.S. creeks and rivers hunting for tiny survivors. Because of chemica pollution, silt, and habitat loss, many species of small, native fish—some found in single creek—have nearly vanished from river systems. Today the nonprofit the m founded, Conservation Fisheries, Inc., works in ten states to preserve and propaga 65 rare species.

From a few fish and eggs, CFI raises hatchlings of threatened species, then places t the species' streams of origin or other hospitable waters. For example: To stem the spotfin chub in the Tennessee River system, CFI spent years introducing hatchling are now reproducing in the wild.

CFI is keeping a few rare fish "in an ark population, because there's no suitable pla put them back," Shute says. CFI's last chucky madtom died in 2008, and since then catfish have not been seen in the wild. "We hope they're still out there," he says, "I not looking good."
